Family breaks

Information about help that is available for families on low incomes in need of a break

Breaks are vital to everyone's wellbeing and quality of life. In the UK, over 2 million children live in families who cannot afford a day trip to the seaside or a simple holiday. For others, caring for a child who is disabled or has special health needs can bring its own pressures making it difficult to afford or organise a holiday.

However the rewards of getting away and spending quality time together as a family away from home can be immense.

There are many charities and organisations that can help – from providing grants for a special activity break, a day out or short holiday as well as free accommodation. Depending on the scheme, different criteria will apply.

Please note this factsheet is not an exhaustive list of organisations and there may be other charities that can help with the cost of a holiday.

Help from UNISON

There for You – Wellbeing breaks programme

At There for You we understand that sometimes a break is needed for example to help us recover from an illness, accident or operation; to take a much needed break from caring responsibilities; to help us get over a tragic event; or to provide families under severe pressure an opportunity to spend quality time together.

For members coping on low income a break can be an absolute lifeline.

Good to know

Members should contact their branch welfare officer for more information and to request an application form.

Branch welfare officers should refer to the latest guidance and eligibility criteria.

“Thank you for helping me to get away. It was wonderful to see my children having so much fun especially given what we’ve all been through over the last year. They’ve been telling everyone about it – their smiles say it all. I feel so much stronger and am now looking forward to returning to work very soon.”
